FORGETTING WITH DISCRIMINATION.

There are few things more difficult than to be a successful carrying out of a policy of reconciliation where there has been estrangement of misunderstanding. It is to change a spectacle to be sold brethren of the same faith and citizens of the same Republic falling down in the path of the one who have been estranged, and letting by-gones be by-gones. As it was the first of Republican policy to urge upon the country, after the war, the policy of reconciliation, from the political-economic as well as the humanitarian and sentimental point of view, so the Tribune has continued to approve and commend every measure that looked to the removal of old prejudices and animosities, and to the establishment of friendly relations as a better understanding between the two later warring sections. It is proper that we should say now that the program of reconciliation by by-gones, and in only forgetting but forgetting all the unpleasantness of the past, has been especially since the Democrats have had control of one branch of Congress—as to exceed our highest hopes and most sanguine expectations. In the matter of forgetting the old prejudices and animosities, the Southern States have shown a willingness and readiness that cannot be excepted the admiring attention of the country. This has been particularly the case with the members from Southern States and the officials of the House, who, in the most of the Southern States, have taken a cheerful way in which these gentlemen have responded to the appeal to forgive and forget, and the sincerity with which they have come forward and allied their names in the most solemn manner to pay-lia in attempts on their anxiety to let by-gones be by-gones, have excited the wonder and admiration of everybody. Never a people or a party or by-gones be by-gones with such a prodigious! Among the by-gones were the Confederate soldiers—how good that was of them—and they would have been forgotten entirely had not some inconsiderate irresponsible brought them forward the other day in connection with a proposition to pay some Confederate claims on old mail contracts, which somebody somehow had failed to forget.

All this goes to show that the policy is a success. So much so, that we deem it entirely safe, at this juncture, to remark that there is just a possibility of carrying the thing too far. We ought to have here and there a by-gone for the purposes of history. For instance, without dwelling upon the numerous instances of the kind, we need not that there has been a war; and without being unkind, that there were two sides to it; and without being offensive, that the side which was not the one to be forgiven. But at the rate Congress is going on—especially in the House—its treatment—everything will be swept out shortly, and nothing left for history. The present Doorkeeper of the House has concluded himself to such an extent and forgotten, and passed his by-gones that degree that he secretly knows what side triumphed in the war. He has a class of employees in his department in the up of disabled soldiers, who are on what is called the "Soldiers' Roll." The object of this classification was to furnish employment to Union soldiers who served in the war.

By way of letting by-gones be by-gones, the Union soldiers on the roll have been removed. To show that he had given every body, and forgotten that there were two sides in the war, Doorkeeper Polk appointed a Mr. Patton, who was a soldier for two years in the Confederate army. Then he appointed a Mr. Patton, who was a soldier in the army, but served in the army which he entered four years after the war was closed. Then Mr. Patton, who was never in the army at all, had been in the State militia. Then Mr. Patton, who was not conscious of having served in army, navy or State militia, but, in fact, he was in the Soldiers' Roll, drew his pay like a little major. There are only a few instances. Doubtless more might be cited, but these are enough to show how zealous Mr. Doorkeeper Polk is in the great work of forgetting himself and his friends, and forgetting the Union soldiers who fought and died by-gones be by-gones. To the credit of Union soldier who he removes from office, and to whoever expeditious against putting Confederate soldiers on their pension rolls, he pays in his large hearted way, he has forgotten this great let-by-gones be by-gones. With which wish of sentiment he issues orders for the removal of several more pensioners and puts numbers of his own family in their place. He is an encouragement to the patriotic, Doorkeeper Polk is; no man ever buried the past with such discrimination.

Meantime, the disabled Union soldier, thrust out from the position a grateful people had given him for his services in putting down rebellion, looks indignantly on as they rebel soldier whom he lately met in some shop exactly up to take his place and pay. To him the mind of history turns a wondering face, and asks the meaning of this sudden change. And the worn soldier sadly answers, "I don't pretend to understand it, but they call it letting by-gones be by-gones."

The Democrats of New Hampshire were confident of victory, until they heard that Hon. W. F. Chandler had gone home to work against the war. He took off his coat for the Democrats and rallied his friends upon the original standard Republican platform, ignoring all modern nonsense. Mr. Chandler is a power, and the organs haven't killed him off to any great extent. Traveler.

The Spring elections in Iowa, unlike those in some of the Eastern States, show a gain rather than a falling off in Republican strength. The party has not only held its own, but has gained control in several localities hitherto in the hands of the Democrats. And Iowa was the first State where the Republican Convention refused to approve the policy of the Administration—N. Y. Tribune.
